From refractive index. The critical angle is simply a result of the refractive index contrast between the film and the ambient. Of course, in this case we are talking about the x-ray refractive index (not the usual refractive index for visible light). In the case of neutrons, the film similarly exhibits a neutron refractive index.

Each of the categories described above includes a huge range of narrower critical approaches. Even so, one often finds that elements of the two broad categories inform criticism based on the other approach. Film reviews, for instance, will sometimes take up political or sociological concerns in the course of issuing formal-aesthetic judgments.
