When Votan awoke, encased in cool dark water, it was clear his body had been destroyed, his light sent back to the cenote. The same had happened once before, several centuries earlier when he'd accidentally fallen into a volcano. A long story. This time, however, something was wrong, alarmingly wrong.

I love her dialogues to some characters she mingled with. I guess, what I really like about this whole story is that, it is unique in a sense. I have never heard of Mayan stories and it's cool to know some even though it might not be really true (I honestly don't have any idea about it except Mayans said that 2012 is the end of the world).
