The Spiders House Paul Bowles

In Spider's House, Paul Bowles leaves behind the moral lessons of meddling American's and decides to focus, truly, on the events of Morocco. Set during their revolution against the French, the story follows two strands, that of an illiterate but intelligent native boy and that of an American novelist (and his cohorts, at differing times) living in the country for the last five years.

This essay analyses Paul Bowles' The Spider's House and interrogates its representational strategies. While readings of Bowles' work have often prioritized interest in the existential dilemmas of his western characters in their encounter with foreign cultures, I read the text from the positionality of a native Moroccan.
