After a day's heavy fighting, the leading troops of the Brigade (1st Battalion, 1st Punjab Regiment) broke through and started to relieve the Kohima garrison. By this point, Kohima resembled a battlefield from the First World War, with smashed trees, ruined buildings and the ground covered in craters.

The Battles of Imphal and Kohima

Between 5 and 18 April, Kohima saw some of the bitterest close-quarter fighting of the war. In one sector, only the width of the town's tennis court separated the two sides. When, on 18 April, the relief forces of the British 2nd Division arrived, Richards's defensive perimeter was reduced to a shell-shattered area only 350 metres square.
